RESEARCH AND TEACHING INTERESTS

My approach to public health is guided by the application of health equity and social justice within underserved and/or marginalized communities. I approach this work from a community-based participatory research (CBPR) framework. Thus, I seek to engage community organizations and community leaders in partnerships to identify health priorities that are mutually beneficial to all partners.

My approach to teaching is guided by: 1) a commitment to creating learning environments in which all students can work towards a better understanding of how systems influence health in their communities, 2) the use of narrative to personalize and demonstrate the ways that systems impact health and 3) a belief that students should be exposed to a diverse and broad perspective of health research and applications.
